I. INTRODUCTION

There have been major legal developments on the problem of hate speech in Japan since 2013. Prior to 2013, hate speech was not considered a serious concern in Japan, while in many democratic countries, it had been one of the top controversies for several decades. In fact, the term “hate speech” was only known to very limited groups of people in Japan: constitutional law scholars, social scientists, journalists, and other civil

Japan's Hate Speech Law > Prof. Setsuo Miyazawa >
Dr. Venkat Iyer

Dear Professor Higashikawa,

I am writing at the suggestion of Professor Setsuo Miyazawa. I am a practising lawyer and legal academic based in Northern Ireland. One of my areas of interest and specialisation is freedom of expression, and I am particularly interested in issues around hate speech (among other things, I advise governments on how to deal with hate speech without sacrificing basic freedoms). I understand that you have done a lot of work in this area.

Thomas Keck > Ronald Krotoszynski > Lisa Ramsey

Dear Professor Koji Higashikawa,

I am a trademark law professor at the University of San Diego School of Law. Professor Ronald Krotoszynski recommended that I contact you about Japanese law on freedom of expression – he said he met you at a conference and thought you might be able to help me. This summer I am writing a paper currently entitled A Free Speech Right to Trademark Protection? which considers.....

A FREE SPEECH RIGHT TO TRADEMARK PROTECTION?

*By Lisa P. Ramsey

I. INTRODUCTION

Many governments refuse to register and protect as trademarks certain categories of words or symbols that are offensive to members of the public.¹ For example, Section 2(a) of the Lanham Act—the federal trademark law in the United States—bans registration of trademarks which are immoral or scandalous, or which may disparage people, institutions, beliefs, or
